Catherine Parr (alternatively Katherine or Kateryn) (c.1512 – 5 September 1548) was Queen of England and of Ireland (1543–47). She was the last of the six wives of King Henry VIII. She married him on 12 July 1543, and outlived him by one year. She was also the most-married English queen, with four husbands. She was also the first woman to be queen of both England and Ireland. Catherine had ...

Catherine Parr - Simple English Wikipedia, the free ...

Katherine Parr was the first Queen of England to publish a book. Religious self-examination was all the rage amongst the educated women of the early sixteenth century, and Katherine was a worthy heir to the fashion. She was not the first royal woman to appear in print: her grandmother-in-law, Lady Margaret Beaufort, had translated and published "The Mirror of Gold to the Sinful Soul" in 1507 ...

The letters, which reveal a different side of the queen, are compiled and preserved in the 2011 compilation "Katherine Parr: Complete Works & Correspondences" by Janel Mueller. According to Mueller, the letters started mid-February, 1547, AFTER the death of King Henry.

Katherine Parr's Letter to Lord Seymour: February 1547 ...

This is a compiled book of the works of Queen Katherine Parr. It's not a biography but actual letters and the transcription of her two books into modern English. The author did an amazing job and I don't see how anyone can give this anything less than five stars.

Katherine Parr: Complete Works and Correspondence ...

This is why a scholarly edition of Katherine Parr's 'Complete Works and Correspondence,' edited by Janel Mueller, is such a joy. Here we have one of Henry VIII's queens—the one who survived him—in her own words, making laws as regent of England, writing confessional prayers or short childish notes as a little girl. . . . Katherine Parr is one of the lesser known of Henry's wives ...
